DAPPY-DOOR-NIGHT, sb. Dev. The evening before Shrove Tuesday; see below. Also called Lentsheidnight.

Dev. 3 Still observed in the most remote villages of the county.

On this night children collected in small bands of six or seven, each armed with pieces of broken crockery, half a brick, or a big stone, any missile served provided it would make plenty of noise. Thus armed they attacked the doors of every house within reach, those of reputed witches and old feeble persons getting the lion's share of 'daps.' After dapping to their hearts' content they would scuttle away singing, 'Us sees by the latch, There's summat tu catch, Us sees by the string The old dummon's within, Gie us a pan-cake, now us be come, Or tu your door there goes a gert stone, So you be a-bound var tu gie us wan 'n.Dev.On'dappy-door-night' everybody rings everybody else's door-bell, or knocks at their knocker, Chanter Wanderings (1887) ix.

(1) Sc. 'A' the birds in the air' and 'A' the days of the week' are also common games, Blackw. Mag. (Aug. 1821) 36 (JAM.). Per. Each player takes one of the days of the week as a name, and all stand in a circle except one who stands in the centre of the ring. He throws a ball into the air, at the same time calling out a day of the week, say Monday. The boy owning this name must then catch the ball before it strikes the ground, and whenever he does so the boys stop and call out 'Jinkers,' unless the boy in the centre calls out 'No Jinkers,' when the rest all have boy in the centre calls out 'No Jinkers,' when the rest all have to stand still in their places. Then 'Monday' tries to strike some one with the ball. If he succeeds, the boy struck must go into the centre and throw the ball; if not 'Monday' must do so himself. Any one struck ten times is 'off' the game, the object of the game being to stop on longest (G.W.). (2) Suf. GARDINER Hist. Dunwich (1754). (3) Dev. Amid Dev. Alps, 182. (4) n.Lin Many persons have not yet forgiven those who made the change, as it has thrown, say they, all the fairs in the country wrong. Persons who were born before 1752 were never weary of denouncing those who had in their opinion robbed them of of denouncing those who had in their opinion robbed them of their birthdays

II. Idiomatic uses.

1. Used as an auxiliary in the present and past tense of verbs, to give additional emphasis.

Chs. A man will say 'I did do' in reply to 'Why did you?' or 'Why did you not?' and in reply to 'Why do you never go to church?' he will even say 'Well! I do do sometimes' The explanation is that 'do' is either an auxiliary verb, or it is an intransitive verb meaning to perform. The first 'do' is auxiliary, the second intransitive. Glo. While they've a-got she to nuss 'um the poor little dears does do well, Buckman Darke's Sojourn (1890) 11, Glo. 'Almost invariably used in the present tense of verbs, 'I do like,' 'I do feel,' 'When you do come,' 'They do be fighting up yonder.' 'Did' is also used in the same way as 'I did go' for 'I went' Sur. Poir is also used in the same way as 'I did go' for 'I went' Sur. Poor chap, thee do look abon a bit hot, Bickley Sur. Hills (1890) I. 1; 'Ee doee need it, ib III. i; Sur.¹ Emphatic before vb. Mus'r —, he do say that it's more nor three hundred year old. w.Hmp., Dor. I do do, I do go, I do eat (H C.M B.). Wil. I do tel, Ellis, 44. s.Wil. I do know what they be, Monthly Mag. (1814) II 114 Dor. Freq. used as an expletive. 2. Cases in which 'do' is not used or gen. omitted.

w.Yks. The auxiliary verb 'diu' is never used in asking questions, except when it begins the sentence: Dipo (dojo) high il diut? do you think he will do it? but Wilo diut, high jo? will he do it, do you think? WRIGHT Gram Wndhll (1892) 72. s.Chs! The auxiliary 'do' is gen omitted in an affirmative command, but where employed is very emphatic, 73. w.Mid Omitted in sentences such as-'If you am't done it you ought to it,' I meant to it,' &c. (W.P.M.) w.Som. Not often used except as an auxiliary. Such a phr. as 'what are you doing?' is never heard. 'Haut bee baewt?' is the common equivalent... 'Kan ur due ut?' would have rather a technical sense. Merely to express action, we seldom use the verb 'do,' but usually a more definite verb signifying the specific work or action going on, Elworthy Gram. (1877) 71.

3. Used elliptically for 'if you do,' &c.

DOBBY HORSE, sb. Yks. Chs. Not. [do'bi-os.]

1. A hobby-horse; see below.

Chs. An imitation horse which figures in the play performed by the 'Soulers' (qv). It is usually made up with a horse's skull fastened to the top of a staff. A man, in a stooping posture, holds the staff so that his legs form the horse's hind legs, his back the horse's back, and the staff serves for the horse's forelegs. The man is hidden under a rug or a skin; and there is an arrangement of strings or wires by which he can make the jaws open and shut. Most panishes possess a horse's skull, preserved from year to year for the occasion. The whole thing has a most unearthly appearance, and generally causes a good deal of consternation amongst the children, and even women, of a household where the play is performed currant cake made in shape of a baby and given to children at Christmas. Not so many years ago the 'putter lad' expected his 'hewer' to bring him the 'yule-doo.' If the hewer failed to bring one, the putter would take the hewer's clothes, put them into a 'tub,' fill it up with rubbish, and send it 'to bank', orif the 'doo' was not well made, the putter nailed it to a tub and wrote the hewer's name underneath. [The Yule-dough or Dow was a kind hewer's name underneath. [The Yule-dough or Dow was a kind of baby, or little image of paste, which our bakers used formerly to bake at this season and present to their customers, in the same manner as chandlers give Christmas candles, Brand Pop. DOWSE, v.¹ Som. Dev. Cor. Also written dawse, dawze Som. [deuz.] To use the divining-rod for the purpose of finding springs of water or veins of metal. w.Som. The rod or twig I have seen used is a fork of about a foot long, cut off just below the bifurcation, and in size each limb is about as large as a thick straw. The wood, it is said, must be either 'halse,' or whitethorn, and may be used either green or dry. The operator holds an end of the twig firmly between the fingers and thumb of each hand, and with the elbows pressed rigidly against the sides; consequently the two ends of the twig are pulled asunder, with the centre, or juncture of the fork, pointing downwards. He then moves very slowly forward, and when over a spring the twig turns outwards, and twists upon itself into an upright position. In some parts of the county the operation is called right position. In some parts of the county the operation is called Jowsing, and the operator a Jowser. Cor. And sometimes we do dowsey, Forfar Pentowan (1859) v, Cor.<sup>3</sup>

Hence (1) Dowser, sb. (a) one who uses a divining-rod to discover water or metal; (b) the rod of hazel used to discover water or metal; (2) Dowsing, vbl. sb. the operation of searching for water or metal with the diviningrod; (3) Dowsing-rod, see Dowser (b).

(1, a) Som I should have more faith in the spade, than in the hazel rods, even though handled by a professional dowser, Hervey Wedmore Chron. (1887) I. 24. w. Som. The power of the Dowser to discover water is not merely a surviving superstition, but is believed in by hard-headed, practical men of the world. Quite recently a Sanatorium was to be built upon a high and apparently very dry spot, where of course the first necessity was water. Three professional Dowsers were sent for separately, and unknown to each other, with the result that all three pointed to the same spot, where a well was dug and abundant water found. Dev. The superstition relative to the dowsing or divining rod, and the dowsers themselves, is too well known to be noticed here, BRAY Desc Tamar and Tavy (1836) III. 260. Cor. A dowser laid claim to the peculiar gift of discernment of metal and of water, Barking-Gould Arminell (1890) 409; Cor. 12 (b) Cor. 1 A forked twig of hazel Held loosely in the hand, the point to the dowser's breast, and Held loosely in the hand, the point to the dowser's breast, and is said to turn round when they are standing over metal. 6 A game, see below

Yks In vogue about half a century ago, but now believed to be nearly obs The lads place their fists endways, the one on the other till they form a high pile of hands Then a boy, who has one hand fice, knocks the piled fists off one by one, saying to every boy 'What's there, Dump?' He continues this piocess till he comes to the last fist, [after a fixed dialogue has been recited] every one endeavours to refrain from speaking in spite of mutual nudges and grimaces, and he who first allows a spite of mutual nudges and grimaces, and he who first allows a word to escape is punished by the others in the various methods adopted by schoolboys. In some places—the children pile their fists in the manner described above—then one and sometimes all of them sing 'I've built my house, I've built my wall, I don't care where my chimneys fall!' The merriment consists in the bustle and confusion occasioned by the rapid withdrawal of the hands, Gomme Games (1894) 117
